Maropost is building something structurally rare: a unified commerce platform with real merchant scale and the organisational will to modernise while still shipping customer value. The Retail Express role sits at the centre of that – owning POS, inventory, payments, and integrations while contributing to the broader cloud and ecosystem strategy. That is not a maintenance role; it is a platform product role with compounding leverage, and it matches the type of work I have been doing for the past several years.

At Rohde & Schwarz I owned a data management platform for the European FCAS defence programme. The environment was technically complex, the stakeholder map was multinational, and delivery had stalled before I arrived. I rebuilt the discovery-to-delivery loop – user stories, acceptance criteria, GitOps rollout – and shipped a feature independently that a senior engineer had been blocked on for over a year. Deployment cycle time dropped from multiple days to under forty minutes. The discipline I applied there – operational workflow mapping, cross-functional alignment, data provenance, and measurable release outcomes – applies directly to the Retail Express modernisation agenda.

At Emil Group I joined a prototype-stage InsurTech platform that had lost client confidence and sprint discipline simultaneously. I split a bloated seventeen-person team into focused Scrum units, reintroduced velocity tracking, and ran weekly product workshops with clients until trust was rebuilt. Senior developer attrition dropped to near zero. That experience is directly relevant to any PM role where the platform is mid-transformation and stakeholder confidence needs to be maintained in parallel with delivery velocity.

Earlier, at AOK Health Insurance (ITSCare), I led the migration of an internal procurement webshop to Shopware, including complex catalogue integration, API wiring, and configurable approval-policy workflows. That is the closest analogue I have to a retail operations context – and it gave me direct appreciation for how much operational nuance lives inside what looks like a simple storefront. I understand that POS and inventory software is really workflow software with a retail skin, and that is where good PM work lives.

I am based in Berlin, available within four weeks, and genuinely interested in what Maropost is building. I would welcome a conversation about the Retail Express roadmap and where my background fits best.

Best regards, Philipp Hilbert
